

Getting around town

Greensboro Transit Authority and Specialized Community Area Transportation

For almost 200 years, public transportation has given us another way to get us where we're going. In 1829, our country's first bus service began in New York City, and in the early 1920s, Greensboro started its own transit system.

Today, the Greensboro Transit Authority operates 34 buses that are far more comfortable and accessible than the early passenger carriers. The buses run 24 routes and connectors, offering about 2.3 million passenger trips per year!

Most bus routes start and end at the J. Douglas Galyon Depot, a renovated Southern Railway station complex. Passengers with disabilities who cannot ride the bus receive curb-to-curb service from "SCAT," which stands for Specialized Community Area Transportation. The SCAT vans take them wherever they need to go in Greensboro.

From 1925 to 1991, Greensboro's public transit system was operated by Duke Power, the same company that provides electricity to your home!
